On July 3, the summer school on “Socio-Economic Opportunities and Inequality” was launched at the Central Bank’s Dilijan Research and Training Center. The event is organized in cooperation with the Yerevan Economic School and the Stone Center for Research on Wealth Inequality at the University of Chicago.

The goal of the summer school is to equip young researchers with up-to-date knowledge and skills to study the dynamics of socio-economic inequality. The program includes lectures and discussions with leading scientists from around the world, as well as opportunities for participants to present their own research ideas and receive feedback and guidance.

The summer school participants include PhD students, doctoral candidates, and young faculty members from various universities, including the University of Chicago, Cornell University, the European University Institute, Pompeu Fabra University, the Luxembourg Institute of Socio-Economic Research, Moscow State University, the American University of Armenia, Yerevan State University, and the Russian-Armenian University.

This initiative is part of the Central Bank’s commitment to research excellence, aiming to promote a culture of evidence-based decision-making.
